Did you know that...

Since the first decades of the eighteenth century, primary schools already existed in every village of Fassa. Only the students of Penia had to go to Alba. Lessons were taught by priests, and when one of these couldn't teach any more, the breadwinners decided altogether who could take his place. The most influential religious authority of the valley was the priest of San Giovanni, to whom the control task was entrusted. After few times he was officially nominated Regio Ispettore Scolastico (Royal School Inspector), with the commitment to visit regularly the schools.
